ABSTRACT

An improved technique of interfacing with databases and other information sources is disclosed. A set of transaction switches evaluates particular transactions to determine the type, quantity, and other parameters associated with information access. The transaction switches then spread the transactions across multiple transaction engines, in a manner such that equal processing load is placed upon the transaction engines. The transaction engines then interface directly with information sources, such as databases.